要旨(800字程度)

Various problems of development projects implemented under the Suharto regime became unveiled in the era of the Reformasi, reformation of socioeconomic-politics in the 2000s afterwards. This study reports the development shocks of Kotapanjang Project in Sumatra, a large-scale infrastructure development project implemented in the 1990s. Villagers' attitude will be observed how they responded to and coped with sudden forced changes brought about by the displacement and resettlement. Shedding light on the legal reforms in the era of Reformasi, this study attempts to clarify the reasons of difficulty and bewilderment in the project implementation. Studying the development of Kotapanjang constitutes a promising approach to reviewing Minangkabau's matrilineal system underwent legal pluralism and the subsequent lack of governance, which are critical issues in many other developing countries particularly confronting middle income trap. This study is based on an author's research in the villages of Kota Panjang where Minangkabau matrilineal tradition was predominant.
